Write a comment Google Chrome is the latest browser we at Virus Bulletin have tested against and Google has released a patch to fix an issue that makes web browsers to be less secure. While Chrome wasn't the most vulnerable out of the browsers we tested, a vulnerability allowed a website to steal the contents of the screen. The bug could be exploited through websites that display videos or run games and that makes it a real threat. "This vulnerability requires physical interaction with the machine, With the recent growth of Android malware we are seeing an increase in apps being presented as a typical Google search. One example is the App that was taken down from the Google Play Store. We have seen this quite often recently as reported by Kaspersky's Ran Miklos (here). Sometimes these apps are intentionally installed, but on other occasions it could be that customers were tricked into downloading. A fortnight ago we saw a new app app named MessageroKioi introduced into the Russian store. This app was quickly removed but not before the creator benefited financially from the introduction. According to Kaspersky's data, this is what happened. The App was downloaded on average over 10,000 times within the first day, but within 4 days it was downloaded over 100,000 times. Within a month of being on the store it had amassed over 250,000 downloads. Why was this app so popular? Mostly, because of its deceptive appearance. The app appeared as a standard messaging app and, once installed, it was very hard to discern its true nature. One reason was that the app contained a large number of external links that took users to websites that made it look like it was a messaging app. Once users had visited these sites the app started to download various applications. The one that triggered suspicion was a screen protector app called Eye Care. When the Eye Care app was installed it started downloading the Play Store and some other apps from the Play Store. Once the Play Store was downloaded it was very easy for the creator of the app to trick people into downloading the apps. The applications downloaded by the app as a result of the Play Store links were not the most trusted apps, and this made it harder for users to identify the true nature of the app. A screen protector app? Nope Taken from the app store Searching the Play
