Specifically, the use of a two-part unsaturated polyester resin such as one prepared by the esterification of a polyol and an organic di- or poly-carboxylic acid to form a polyester resin as in the case of an unsaturated polyester or epoxy adhesive is well known in the art. The unsaturated polyester resin is typically mixed with a catalyst and then applied to a substrate. Such a reactive system cures or cross-links by a chemical reaction resulting from the catalyzed free-radical polymerization of the unsaturated resin. In order to further optimize the adhesion between two substrates, it is often necessary to apply to one of the substrates a primer coating or a precoat which is typically a mixture of a diluent and an adhesion promoter (such as an aminoplast resin) prior to applying the liquid resin to the substrate. The liquid resin is then typically applied to the substrate, and the resulting layer of liquid resin is then allowed to cure. During this process of curing, the cured coating bonds to the substrate. While such an adhesion-promoting coating adds time and cost to the production process, the resulting bond is typically stronger than that produced by direct application of the curing resin to the substrate. As a result, such a two-step process is common in industries in which a strong bond is required, such as building materials, for example. The primary disadvantage to such a process is the significant amount of time required to apply the primer coating and then the curing resin. In applications where speed is critical, however, the time required to apply the primer and then the adhesive may be prohibitive. The present invention provides a means for joining two materials in a relatively short time so that the intermediate coating and primer is not necessary.Wesleyan Chapel, Braidwood Wesleyan Chapel in Braidwood, New South Wales is a
