(Reuters) - Australia's Telecommunications Industry

Ombudsman is likely to issue a ruling on a complaint by U.S. chipmaker Qualcomm Corp against Huawei by the end of March, the ombudsman said on Wednesday.

Huawei has been denied entry into Australia on national security grounds, with the government saying it is concerned about the risk of the Chinese telecoms giant's equipment being used by Beijing in espionage or subversive activities. Huawei has repeatedly denied the allegations. "I expect to rule at the end of this month," Telecommunications Industry Ombudsman, Alan Berg, told Reuters. The ombudsman's office said Huawei had been given the chance to respond to a series of questions that Qualcomm had sent to it in the past two weeks. The ombudsman said that he would not be taking further action before that ruling was handed down. At the heart of the dispute is whether the Commerce Department's allegations are actually justified and whether the ban on Huawei entering Australia is justified, a Huawei executive told Reuters. In November, Huawei made its first attempt to enter Australia by filing a complaint against the government, saying the ban was invalid because the government was acting beyond its powers. The ombudsman said there had been continuing delays in the regulatory process, with no detailed explanation from the government. The ombudsman said it had a good relationship with the government and hoped a final judgment would be handed down soon.

Project Summary/Abstract

Current mass spectrometry-based proteomics methods are limited by their inability to identify primary sequence specificity and measurement error in large proteomes. This is especially problematic for small molecule drugs, biologics, and other therapeutic agents whose development has been predominantly mediated by high-throughput assays in biological
