If the main purpose of the ABB is to act as a “policymaker” and to design a system that is supposedly fair and egalitarian, the favourable position of those in the best paid trainees is clearly a mistake and should be avoided. This is clearly the case in the service industry. I’m not an economist, so I’m not qualified to say what the ratio should be between the number of trainees who can be hired and the number of trainees who are hired. I guess that the answer is somehow related to the number of potential employees who want to take a job in a given sector and the average duration of that job (due to the fact that as hiring a new employee takes a longer time than hiring a new trainee, trainees that are hired before them may have higher productivity than trainees that are hired later). “The ABB is clearly a mistake and should be avoided”. Who said that? You? I love your arguments. If I understand you correctly, your argument is that companies make profits on behalf of their customers and in exchange get to keep the profits - thus
