Spinal cord injury (SCI) can take a toll on a person's physical health and can also affect his or her psychological wellbeing. Many individuals with SCI report unemployment and underemployment. Employers may not know how to engage and support people with disabilities, but it's important that they find the right kind of support system if they want to allow a person with SCI to work. Employers should think about work with SCI as employment for the whole person; that is, they should try to avoid ageist, racist, or other prejudiced attitudes that can cause undue hiring difficulties. People with disabilities can receive job training and education to prepare them for employment. Once they are able to work, there are services that can help employers understand the special needs of the employees. Working with spinal cord injury patients, workers, and job coaches can help them find high-quality employment.Leveraging the large number of 19 mer peptides (20-amino acid peptides) expressed in Escherichia coli in hand-penned and wall-less growth chambers, we have developed an assay that measures the molecular weight of a peptide in the presence of other contaminants in a high-throughput fashion. For various 19 mer peptides of known molecular weight, the measured molecular weight is within the standard deviation of the known value. For peptides where the single amino acid is a non
