Adobe has introduced several new features to Lightroom 5. Lightroom developers can now use some of the new features, but they have to pay for the privilege. A few such features are:

1. Printing Support
2. Mixed-Size Images
3. Paint Bucket Here are the possible Print Communication Settings choices:
 1. "None"
 2. "1:1"
 3. "Medium"
 4. "2:1"
 5. "3:1"
 6. "4:1"
 7. "5:1"
 8. "6:1"
 9. "8:1"
 10. "10:1"
 11. "12:1"
 12. "14:1"
 13. "16:1"
 14. "18:1"
 15. "20:1"
 16. "24:1"
 17. "36:1"

18. "72:1" Each setting includes several different print sizes, starting at 1:1 up to 36:1. The Print Communication Settings menu that follows the Above Print Settings menu utilizes the new "Paint Bucket Tool." The new Print Communication Settings can be configured in two ways. First, the minute you select "None" in the Above Print Settings menu, a new Print Communication Settings menu appears showing 16 Print Communication Settings settings. These settings are essentially identical to the settings in the Above Print Settings menu. The second way to configure the settings is to click in the menu to highlight a print size you want to apply, and then click the "Save" button at the right. At this point, you will be told that the selections you make will be saved in the Print Communication Settings menu. I don't mind either way of configuring the Print Communication Settings. The second new feature is that Lightroom will automatically adjust the size of images taken using the front or rear facing Four Thirds cameras. It also adjusts the size of imported RAW images. To achieve these results, Lightroom uses information from the file's EXIF data. It determines the image's size by changing focal length settings and aperture and ISO settings, thus changing the size of the image.
